Reflexión x2

To determine if a paragraph is a reflection, we must first understand that it is a reflection, Oxford LD assigns as one of its definitions the following "careful thought about something, sometimes over a long period of time" and "written or spoken thoughts about a particular subject or topic".

Taking this into account, the method I use to identify a paragraph as a reflection is first to make sure that the ideas or opinions they express are supported by some source of information or depending on the topic by personal experience, and if so, observe if a critical analysis it is really being done so there actually is a careful thought about the topic and it really brings new information or explains his reasoning for asserting something. For example in my reflection "Silver Bullet" I analyze 3 articles and briefly contrast them and with a little of personal experiences and observations I reflect how software systems are just simply too complex and this can be lessened but not eliminated, and almost at the end I mention my thoughts and analysis based on all the above mentioned "there is not and (I firmly believe) there will never be a "silver bullet" that completely eliminates the root cause of errors, the great complexity of these systems"

References:

Oxford LD. Reflection. Retrieved from https://www.oxfordlearnersdictionaries.com/definition/english/reflection?q=reflection